

Research Paper on Slavery Before and After the American Revolution Essay

Introduction

The acts of slavery existed in the 17th and 18th centuries. Before the American Revolution, slavery was conducted in different regions of America. Although the American revolution contributed to positive change in freeing slaves, the acts of slavery were still practiced. The situations and role of slaves before and after the American revolution differs. Additionally, the role and situations of the slaves differed from house to house. During the slavery era, some slaves worked in plantations, industries, babysitting, and other in-house work. Most of the slaves, before and after the American revolution, were African Americans. The research focuses to evaluate the situations and roles of the slaves before and after the American revolution. Also, the paper will analyze whether or not slavery exists in modern American society.

Situations of Slavery Before the American Revolution

The acts of slavery began in 1619 and were triggered by Dutch ship which brought 20 slaves to serve in a British colony. During the 17th century, the British had found the way to North America (Schneider & Carl 3). They were involved in major industrial revolution activities such as farming and industrialization. As such, they required cheap labor to farm their plantation as well as manure labor to learn operations in factories such as the cotton gin. The need for labor for the British colony made them turn to African slaves because they were cheap and more productive in manual labor. Throughout the 17th century, slaves were badly treated by denying them rights to exercise freedom.

Slaves as Commodity for Trade

Before the American Revolution, slaves were viewed as a commodity for trade (Schneider & Carl 2). The demand for slaves by the British colony led to cases where slaves were bought and sold in open markets. During the process of trading slaves, the traders could exchange slaves with money or other commodities. The act of trading humans like commodities is an act of lack of respect to humankind. The slaves were sold to their masters who viewed them as an asset to manage and rule. Depending on different regions, slaves could be even be killed without repercussions because their masters felt that they owned the life of the slaves.

No Right to Education

During the 16th century, education was not common to all. In fact, those who had access to education were privileged (Schneider & Carl 5). To ensure that the slaves were not enlightened about their freedom, they were not allowed to read or write. The slave owners were afraid that educating the slaves would lead to a revolt from the slaves. The limitation to learning was a serious issue such that slaves caught learning would be punished by receiving 300 lashes. The limitation to access education resulted in a situation of illiteracy among the people of color.
