✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

The world witnessed several natural disasters that claim millions and millions of human lives every year. Natural disasters such as volcanic eruption, earthquake and tornadoes are the result of a natural hazard which generally moves from potential into an active phase. This may result in serious damages and affects human activities. Additionally, if there is no proper planning and preparedness, it may lead to human vulnerability, leads financial, structural, and human losses. Hence the loss may depend on the population of the area affected and also the capacity of the population to support or resist the disaster (Bankoff et al. 5-356). Disasters such as floods, hurricanes, tornadoes, and earthquakes can occur in almost any part of the world. However, with the present scientific advancement, it is possible to predict to a certain extent the risk-prone areas. Therefore it is a good idea to prepare for them (Torrence, and Grattan, 2002).

There is a difference between the harm caused in developed and developing nations due to natural disasters. The developed nations are well equipped to face these disasters when compared to developing nations of the world. A comparison of Natural disasters in developed and developing countries show that the injury and death rates can be up to 100 times higher in the poorer developing countries. This happens because of the financial constraints and the poor living conditions in developing nations (World Bank 1-4). This paper intends to describe three natural disasters (Tornadoes, Earthquakes and Hurricanes) that have claimed several lives and economical damages.

Tornadoes

A tornado is defined as a violently rotating column of air that is in contact with both a cumulonimbus (or, in rare cases, a cumulus) cloud base and the surface of the earth. Tornadoes are of many sizes, however, these are normally in the form of a visible condensation funnel, with the narrow end touching the earth and the broader end
