

Part C: State Collection: Constant Voltage, Changing Resistance

In other circuit experiments, you will change the resistance in one of the other three resistors. The voltage will stay the same (4V). More than the Resistor values in these listed in Part Table 2 and record the values for each setting. Constant is recorded in millamps (mA).

- (15) Sketch a graph of changing resistance vs current and voltage.

- (16) What effect does increasing the resistance have on the amount of current through a circuit?

~~Increasing resistance, decreases the amount of current through a circuit.~~

- (17) If other resistances is replaced, the amount of current will be:

~~The rest of the resistors current.~~

- (18) What happened to the current when the Resistor was increased to 5000 Ω?

~~Current flow is High (0.027A).~~

- (19) Explain how this fits with the Ohm's Law.

~~According to the Ohm's Law  $I = \frac{V}{R}$ .~~

~~Current is directly proportional to the Voltage and inversely proportional to the resistance.~~
~~According to the experiment results, when voltage remains constant but increase current is directly proportional to the voltage. When the resistance becomes constant but decreased it means the current is inversely proportional to the resistance. So it can be concluded that the Ohm's Law was maintained during this experiment.~~
