The 1980s also witnessed an accelerated modernization drive. The government's commitment had paid off bigtime. The infrastructure development effort was complete, and the economy was well on its way to becoming a major force. The Singapore government's development strategy had been successful, and the country was now a major force in the region. In 1980, the government launched a new five-year plan, which was the first of a series of plans that would guide the country's development. The government's strategy was to continue to invest in infrastructure, and to promote the growth of the private sector. The government also sought to improve the quality of life for its citizens, and to ensure that the country was well-prepared for the challenges of the future.
