These findings suggest that the relationship between perceived social support and perceived stress is moderated by the degree of perceived social support. Specifically, the relationship between perceived social support and perceived stress is stronger for individuals with low perceived social support than for individuals with high perceived social support. This finding is consistent with the buffering hypothesis, which suggests that social support buffers the relationship between stressors and stress (Cohen & Wills, 1985). The buffering hypothesis suggests that social support acts as a buffer, reducing the impact of stressors on stress. In this study, the buffering hypothesis was supported, as the relationship between perceived social support and perceived stress was stronger for individuals with low perceived social support than for individuals with high perceived social support.
