Following recently published reports in the United States of a common and increasingly life-threatening Shigella (SS) infection from the tropical state of Kentucky by the same agent, I believe the pattern of increasing the production of these enteric toxins among our and various other strains may indicate the presence of a key region from previous reports, suggesting a common set of genes, particularly those of enterohelial toxin genes. I submit the interest in these reports by the United States of Kentucky may be associated with the same set of genes, particularly those of enterohelial toxin genes.
