¹ The non-translatability, mentioned as an obvious problem in the past of other African literatures, is thus mentioned as being a problem that is not solved easily in the present case—something which might be thought to be due to the fact that, very much as in the past, the author is not able to deal with the subject, although there is something to be said about the author's attitude towards the subject, and about

The large, well-labeled lists of passages which were written down immediately by several independent participants, in a few minutes, after the first, general, and more, two more particular, oral questions, and the responses which appeared for the entire class, indicated very effective use of the written word.
