

Case Study: One Hypothetical Patient Anion

1. Referring to the case study's problem(s), how do you evaluate if any blood acids? What acid and changes have occurred in the acid base balance? Explain in words what you predict for the blood gas results, so that is, hypoventilation among the gas exchange?

Based on the respiratory rate (RR), P_{CO₂} just low (low P_{CO₂}) (think Mary has metabolic acidosis). The acid base balance shifted to the left side (low P_H) is slightly acidic. There is a relationship between P_{CO₂} and P_H, where P_{CO₂} increases, the P_H of the blood would also increase. When P_{CO₂} increases, P_H would be alkalosis. P_{CO₂} is a respiratory acidosis, meaning it is related to the blood P_H.

2. Bicarbonate is one of the major buffers in the blood. Predict a direction of a buffer.

A buffer is a substance that resists the changes in P_H of a solution by neutralizing or substituting hydrogen ions (H⁺) in a solution. It also helps to keep P_H within normal range.

3. Given the information, C O₂ (g) + H₂O (l) ⇌ H⁺ (aq) + HCO₃⁻ (aq) + H₂O (l), what effect would each of the following have on blood pH? Explain.

a. Hyperventilation -- increases blood P_H because CO₂ leaves the plasma rapidly during hyperventilation. The CO₂ more gases leaves normal level, which causes respiratory alkalosis.

b. Infusing your blood that are alkalized (shifted off base) -- decreases P_H because the CO₂ builds up in the blood very quickly in surplus.

c. Chronic diarrhea -- decreases P_H because increased bicarbonate ions are lost from the body. The fluid before the body has lower base content than normal.

d. Exercise/ingestion of lactic acid -- increases P_H because lactic acid from blood enters the blood, more minerals. It will react with hydrogen ions and produce CO₂. P_H will increase.

e. One of the effects of hypoxia is increased ventilation. Predict the effect of hypoxia on the direction of each of the following acids:

a. Bicarbonate (base) -- Bicarbonate will not be produced until it is used to keep pH within normal range which is to compensate.
