Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of molecular motion slowly decreases. Molecules that are bonded remain close to each other and vibrate. Molecules that are not bonded move farther apart. They move a great deal less rapidly than the molecules in the liquid. Molecules separated completely a distance of 10 or 20 molecules from those in the liquid are incapable of forming a continuous film of air. The few molecules on the sides will evaporate and are replaced by new ones from the air. The molecules in the continuous liquid are in contact with one another. The forces between molecules are strong. The molecules are capable of being pulled together and held together together.
