

"Put down beside me a shining angel
To lead me by the hand to the place of refreshment..."
From the Life of St Macrina

"On the Soul and the Resurrection"
A Dialogue between Gregory Nyssa and his sister,
St. Macrina

Part One

Macrina is one of the most beloved of the early Holy Mothers in the Eastern Church, although her Life was eventually translated into Latin and introduced to the West in the 11th century. Her brother, Basil the Great (330-379) is highly regarded in both East and West, and is generally known as the founder of Greek monasticism. He was in debt to his grandmother for first instructing him in religious ideas, his mother for being such a living example that she gave birth to three saints, and to his sister, Macrina, who was responsible for his conversion.

He was educated in Constantinople and Athens and later went to visit the monks of Nitra (in Egypt), who lived a hermit life in the 'cells' carved out of the mountains which separated the desert from Alexandria. When Palladius wrote his Lausiac History, there were 5000 monks there, living alone, in pairs, or small groups. They were self-sufficient, lived in utter simplicity, and daily sang the Psalter: "One can stand and hear the divine psalmody issuing forth from each cell and imagine one is high above in paradise." (1)

Basil, Macrina, and the other saint in the family, Gregory of Nyssa, were born into a wealthy family of aristocrats in Cappadocia. The 'Cappadocian Fathers' are perhaps the most famous of the early Church Fathers in Eastern Christianity. They wrote voluminously, and most of what we know about Macrina comes from Gregory's writings about her.

Before embarking on his career as a bishop, writer and rhetorician, Basil traveled and studied in both city and desert, during which he endured a period of intense asceticism and soul-searching. The solitary desert life never seems to have appealed to Basil, although he felt that he had some kind of religious calling. On returning home, he found that Macrina had organized the family unit (her mother and her 4 younger sisters, along with all of their handmaidens) and withdrawn from the world to a form a monastery in a remote property in the forest. His brother Gregory tells us that while he had been traveling, Basil had been won over to the "pursuit of virtue" by letters from Macrina. (2) He decided, like her, to give his life over to asceticism in community, and thus became perhaps the most influential monastic Father in history. However, as Carolyn Connor explains, it was Macrina who was his model:

"On Basil's return to the family Macrina becomes his mentor and wins him over to the same ideal of philosophy, one in which he too assumes a life of self-deprivation and poverty." (3)
