Paola Uccelli studies socio-cultural and individual differences in early language development and in academic literacy. With a background in linguistics, she explores how different language skills (at the lexical, grammatical, and discourse levels) interact with each other to either promote or hinder advances in language expression and comprehension. She is particularly interested in the challenges and possibilities faced by struggling students as they try to learn the academic discourse valued at school. Her current research addresses questions such as how struggling students expand their academic vocabulary and how they learn to use a variety of discourse structures flexibly and conventionally for diverse communicative purposes.

Christina L. Dobbs is an advanced doctoral student in Human Development and Education at the Harvard Graduate School of Education. Her research interests include academic language development, the argumentative writing of students, and writing instruction. She served as Manuscripts Editor for the Harvard Educational Review, edited a volume titled Humanizing Education: Critical Alternatives to Reform with colleagues, and is a former high school teacher, literacy coach, and reading specialist.

Jessica Scott is a doctoral student in Human Development and Education at the Harvard Graduate School of Education. Her research interests include deaf education and literacy, American Sign Language as second language learning, and school language policies. She recently edited a volume titled Languages in a Global World: Learning for Better Cultural Understanding with Bruno della Chiesa and Christina Hinton. She is a former high school teacher of the deaf, reading specialist and literacy coach.
