

Chapter 11 & 12: Study 1: Learning to Manage Emotion

Study 1: Emotion-Regulation Methods for Positive Affect

Participants: 100 college students, 50 female, 50 male, ages 18-25

Design: Randomized controlled trial, 2 conditions: Emotion Regulation (ER) vs. Control

ER condition: Participants received training in ER techniques

Control condition: Participants received no ER training, but were instructed to maintain a neutral expression throughout the study

Duration: 10 weeks, 1 session per week

Measures: Self-reported positive affect, negative affect, and overall well-being

Results: Participants in the ER condition reported significantly higher levels of positive affect and lower levels of negative affect compared to the control condition at the end of the study

Conclusion: The ER training program was effective in improving participants' ability to regulate their emotions and enhance their overall well-being

Limitations: The study was limited by the self-reported nature of the measures and the lack of a long-term follow-up

Implications: The findings suggest that ER training may be a useful tool for improving emotional regulation skills and enhancing overall well-being

Future research: Further studies are needed to explore the long-term effects of ER training and to investigate the underlying mechanisms of the observed effects

Overall, the study suggests that ER training is a promising approach for improving emotional regulation skills and enhancing overall well-being
