

Paper Example on Personality and Individual Differences Essay

Introduction

There is still an unclear description of personality as a terminology. Majority of people perceive personality in various ways. Individuals may define and understand individuality depending on the context under which it applies. The character is currently one of the most elements of psychology that are under study. There are various aspects of behaviour that are subject to change while researchers consider others to be permanent. An individual's trait such as confidence and sociable reveal the permanent nature of the person. On the other hand, a state as a form of conduct defines the reactive character such as anger and anxiety. Personality is as such what describes a human being.

Personality has a relationship with motivation especially those of the staff. Executives of companies are increasingly considering their employees to be significant in the production levels of their businesses. Yulianti (2017) reveals that human capital has more influence on a firm's operations than financial inputs. Workers, therefore, require motivation for a business to maintain or realize high production. Impetus has different elements which depend on the personality of an employee. Motivation is a determining factor of the conduct of individuals. Inspiration can either be intrinsic or extrinsic (Yulianti, 2017). There are several theories that explain the individuality and differences in individuals. The theories are essential in making managers to understand the behaviours of their staff and as such, establish methods to regulate and inspire their workers. This essay intends to describe the concepts of personality in the perspectives of business and companies. The paper also attempts to evaluate and discuss the impacts of personality on the motivation of employees. Moreover, the report endeavours to establish an argument around the motivational hypothesis and discuss the implications of the essay study in the actual business environments.

Personality Theories

Traits continuously manifest themselves in an individual's life. The character has a relationship with the genetic and biological foundation. Personality effects depend on the situation and as such, are subject to variations which may alter the response of an individual. Monitoring traits for a period may help in determining behaviours. Individualist's theories consider several rules in their formulation. Stability traits of an individual are purportedly unwavering. Genetic base depends on the genetic structure. Generality considers characters to be situational and varying in different contexts while internationalism suggests that elements of a situation determine the response of individuals.

Stability

There are some traits in individuals that imply a constant nature of personality in a lifetime. The characters may, however, undergo alterations with the influence of lifestyle or personal progress. Guay et al. (2016) studies suggest that the changes fail to affect the overall behaviour but influence minor elements of conduct. Traits such as negative attitude and openness decrease while self-esteem
