

*An old system in Thailand for growing cucumbers was to bury straw in the soil, which would start to ferment and provide heat and CO₂. This system can be adapted to grow Trichothema on the soil.*

(right) Experiments with mushrooms in a vegetable polyculture system in the Westland area.

*Growing Trichothema on wood chips in the soil is a low cost method, however, it is difficult to keep pests like snails at bay.*

A simple misted can be built within the greenhouse to maintain a high humidity level for the fruiting of the King oyster. Picture: Pilgerman, Germany.

One new high tech approach would be to grow plants with LED's in a closed container, together with mushrooms to provide the needed CO₂. Ideally, no ventilation would be needed, as the plants would use the CO₂ from the mushrooms and the mushrooms the oxygen from the plants.

A high tech use of a triple with a climate system in combination with a greenhouse. Exhaust CO₂ rich air is blown into the greenhouse, cooling in summer and heating in winter.

Another approach would be to build a greenhouse on top of a mushroom farm and organise the exchange of air from both types of growing rooms. Greenhouses with multiple levels have been built in the last decade, with offices, picking and sorting equipment below and a system to grow plants on top. Mushrooms could be cultivated below the plants. Building a greenhouse on top of an existing mushroom farm however is only feasible when the construction is strong enough.

Step by step

A greenhouse company can start relatively simple with mushroom growing by simply buying substrate from substrate producers. It can test the market with its own mushrooms and learn how to manage the fruiting and picking processes. When the market responds positively, a plan can be made to upcycle waste streams. Producing pasteurised substrates require a lower investment compared to sterilised substrates, however, some of the gourmet mushrooms like shiitake and King Oyster are easier to grow on sterilised substrates. The company can start with pasteurised substrate first (e.g. using immersion in hot water as the best treatment) and in a later stage invest in equipment for sterilised substrates.

first (e.g. using immersion in hot water as the best treatment) and in a later stage invest in equipment for sterilised substrates.

Exterker Oology in Amsterdam started to grow Oyster mushrooms from substrate it bought from a commercial substrate provider. The next step is to produce substrate from the waste stream of the treatment.
