Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of convection within the mantle will also decrease. This could be the slowest-moving force in the long-term evolution of the Earth's interior, as the other two forces are thought to have been far more effective in driving the convection of the young Earth. Current estimates therefore suggest a period of 40 to 50 minutes that would be enough to allow the mantle to convect sufficiently for it to be completely hot. The two difficulties with the idea are, however, that our understanding of what the mantle was like prior to the convection regime was the subject of a number of the 1980s (the mantle composition and shape) and because prior to convection it was not known whether it was homogeneous.
