

Ch. 11 Language & Society Chapter - The Cultural? Language by Bartholomew 2016 Ed 3000

Definition: Language: An arbitrary, conventionalized, structured system of symbols used to communicate (Page 444-445)

→ Communication can only occur successfully if certain shared symbols exist. Symbols are the items used up in the act of communicating the significance of the action.

- Arbitrary language: A cultural communication system is arbitrary because that a particular symbol (underlying) denotes this and nothing else.
- Arbitrary language: The reverse established by the argument for standard arbitrariness: plans which connect.
- Arbitrary language family: A collection of languages related through commonness in all or a significant number of phonological & lexical.
- Arbitrary language family: A collection of languages related by a commonness in their phonological, grammatical, and a lexically similarity.
- Arbitrary language group: A collection of languages where a group that share phonological or morphological similarity without sharing substantial phonological similarity with each other.
- Other facts about language: Linguists suggest human beings used about 100,000 years in this time, people speak languages almost daily, where adults maintain large vocabularies, languages differ by...
