Abstract

On 10 May 1997, the Journal of the American Medical Association published a study by the National Cancer Institute (NCI) that showed that the use of tamoxifen in the treatment of breast cancer was associated with an increased risk of developing blood clots. The study, which was conducted by a team of researchers from the NCI and the University of Michigan, found that the risk of developing blood clots was significantly higher in women who had taken tamoxifen for at least one year compared to women who had not taken the drug. The researchers also found that the risk of developing blood clots was higher in women who had taken tamoxifen for a longer period of time. The study was a retrospective analysis of data from the NCI's Surveillance, Epidemiology, and End Results (SEER) database, which contains information on cancer diagnoses and deaths in the United States. The researchers used data from 1973 to 1994 to identify women who had been diagnosed with breast cancer and who had taken tamoxifen. They then compared the rate of blood clots in these women to the rate of blood clots in women who had not taken tamoxifen. The results of the study showed that the risk of developing blood clots was 1.5 times higher in women who had taken tamoxifen for at least one year compared to women who had not taken the drug. The risk of developing blood clots was also higher in women who had taken tamoxifen for a longer period of time. The researchers concluded that the use of tamoxifen in the treatment of breast cancer was associated with an increased risk of developing blood clots. They recommended that women who were taking tamoxifen should be monitored closely for signs of blood clots.

These findings suggest that the use of a computerized form, instead of a written questionnaire, may be a better way to collect information on the use of the Internet. However, the use of a computerized form may also have some limitations. For example, the use of a computerized form may be more expensive than the use of a written questionnaire. Also, the use of a computerized form may be more difficult to use for some people, especially those who are not familiar with computers. Therefore, the use of a computerized form should be carefully considered before it is used in a research study.

There are two main types of Staphylococcus aureus infections. The first type is a skin infection, such as a boil or abscess. The second type is a more serious infection, such as a pneumonia or sepsis. Both types of infection can be caused by a single bacterium, but the severity of the infection depends on the location of the infection and the person's overall health.
