

Case Study: One Hypothetical Patient Anion

1. Referring to the case study's problem(s), how do you evaluate if any blood acids? What acid and changes have occurred in the acid base balance? Explain in words what you predict for the blood gas results, so that is comprehensive among these values?

Based on the respiratory rate (RR), PCO₂ just low (hyperventilation) likely they have metabolic acidosis. The acid base balance shifted to the left side (low pH) is slightly acidic. There is a relationship between PCO₂ and pH, where PCO₂ increases, the pH of the blood would also increase. When it decreases, pH would also decrease. PCO₂ is a respiratory acid-base balance or balance the blood pH.

2. Bicarbonate is one of the major buffers in the blood. Predict a disturbance of a buffer.

A buffer is a substance that resists the changes in pH of a solution by neutralizing or substituting hydrogen ions (H⁺) in a solution. It also helps to keep pH within normal range.

3. Given the information, CO₂ and H₂O (H₂O + CO₂ → H₂CO₃ → H⁺ + HCO₃⁻), what effect would each of the following have on blood pH? Explain.

a. Hyperventilation -- increases blood pH because CO₂ leaves the plasma rapidly during hyperventilation. The CO₂ ions give blood normal level, which causes respiratory alkalosis.

b. Infusing your bicarbonate ion are substituted/paired off H⁺ -- decreases pH because the CO₂ builds up in the blood very quickly in surplus.

c. Chronic diarrhea -- decreases pH because increased bicarbonate ions are lost from the body. The fluid before the body has lower bicarbonate than normal.

d. Exercise/ingestion of lactic acid -- increases pH because lactic acid from blood enters the blood, some minerals, it will react with hydrogen ions and produce CO₂ for metabolism.

4. One of the effects of hypoxia is increased ventilation. Predict the effect of hypoxia on the direction of each of the following acids:

a. Bicarbonate (base) -- Bicarbonate will not be produced until used to keep pH within normal range which result in alkalosis.
