certification test. This will be in addition to the inclusion of a special language at a master's degree level by some states.

In comparing the role of family nurse practitioner with that of family practice physician (FPP), it is noticed that the two register more similarities than differences. From the outset, both are trained to provide continuing and comprehensive health care to each member of the family encompassing all ages regardless of gender and type of problem (Lugo et. al, 2007). Similarly, both roles involve education and training in family practice and operation in a variety of nontraditional settings. Moreover, family physicians may be a good choice for those who do not want to do a lot of procedures or surgeries as opposed to other practitioners. This may allow family physicians to enjoy a more predictable schedule and better quality of life than some other specialists who have to be more available for emergencies or surgeries as viewed by Duderstadt (2008).

Physician assistants (PAs) on the hand practice medicine under the supervision of physicians and surgeons. This is in contrast to the provision for FNP who have varying levels of physician collaboration. Duderstadt (2008) reports that family nurse practitioners have been found to function independently of physician involvement. Additionally, Duderstadt (2008) states that "PAs are formally trained to provide diagnostic, therapeutic, and preventive healthcare services as delegated by a physician while FNPs are more independent and often cheaper than physicians". Also, PAs differ in their requirements for admission to training programs where most applicants have a college degree and some health-related work experience whereas FNPs must have a
