

What happens to the chemical energy stored in the food consumers eat? It is converted to other forms of energy as the organism carries out its life activities (Figure 1-16). Moving, thinking, breathing, seeing, and everything else you do requires your cells to convert some of the chemical energy of food into other forms of energy. You can compare this energy conversion to a car converting the chemical energy stored in gasoline to the mechanical energy of moving wheels. Whenever an organism or a car performs work, it converts some of its energy supply to heat. The heat is released to the environment. Even when you are sitting still in class, you produce about as much heat as a 100-watt light bulb. Because all organisms lose energy in the form of heat, an ecosystem cannot recycle energy. Life on Earth depends on a continuous supply of energy from the sun.

Regulation

Another theme you will encounter frequently in your study of biology is the ability of organisms to regulate their internal conditions. For example, you have a "thermostat" in your brain that reacts whenever your body temperature varies slightly from 37°C (about 98.6°F). If this internal thermostat detects a slight rise in your body temperature on a hot day, your brain signals your skin to produce sweat. Sweating helps cool your body.

Panting is another example of a cooling mechanism. You've probably seen a dog pant on a hot day, but did you know that some birds also pant (Figure 1-17)? Panting causes moisture on the large surface of the animal's lungs to evaporate, cooling the body as a result.

The ability of mammals and birds to regulate body temperature is just one example of homeostasis, or "steady state." Mechanisms of homeostasis enable organisms to regulate their internal environment, despite changes in their external environment.
