

Removing the action

This should take only a few minutes. Have a flat work surface ready that won't easily mark, as the steel bottoms of the action posts may be sharp. (In 7.14 I'm running risks for a quick adjustment!) Keep children and pets out of the way.

The action is held in by two or three bolts connecting the frame of the piano to the action posts. Most modern pianos have two action posts – one at each end – but some have three and the mighty 1915 Steinway shown in 7.15 has four – and just look at the size of the pressure bars!

1 Undo the knurled nuts on the action bolts – possibly with pliers if they haven't been off for a long time. (Finger-tight is enough when you put them back.)

2 Examine the pedal mechanism at the bass end. Can the action be pulled out without anything fouling it? In most pianos there shouldn't be a problem; the pedal rods come up to the levers on the end of the action and when the action is removed, they simply come away.

3 But pedal mechanisms like that in 7.16 must be disconnected before the action can be removed. Pull the lever up far enough, and the prong will drop out. Don't lose the rubber liner from the hole, or the mechanism will clank forever more. (If you do lose it or it wasn't there anyway, you can improvise a liner from felt. See Pedal adjustment – Variant pedal mechanisms.)

4 For all pianos, check that there are no other connections. For example, some pianos have a small tie bar (7.17), a bracket near the middle of the piano from the keyboard to the action. If it's there, disconnect it.

5 Pull the action back a little, until the lugs are clear of the bolts.

6 Hold the action with both hands firmly gripping the rest rail – the wooden cross-member against which the hammers rest (7.19).

7 Pull the action up and out of the piano. It isn't too heavy – 20lb (9kg) or so – but is an awkward shape to deal with. If the piano has three action posts, manoeuvre carefully around the bolt for the middle post, as a damper can easily be ripped off on the way – see 7.18. This Rogers also has a fly damper (circled). 7.20 shows how the last few dampers in an overstrung upright are shortened. To make up for this deficiency, some piano makers include one or more of these extra little fly dampers attached to the existing one. They're fairly ineffective but have lots of snagging potential.

8 Put the action straight down on your work surface. It's then fairly easy to remove the keyboard.
