Types of Support:

What structures are used to support the plant? (how, and what is the support structure made of?)

Plants have a system of water transport (xylem) and a system of nutrient transport (phloem). The xylem is the main water transport system, and the phloem is the main nutrient transport system. The xylem is made of long, thin cells that are connected end-to-end, forming a continuous tube. The phloem is made of shorter cells that are also connected end-to-end, but they are not as long as the xylem cells.

Plants also have a system of support structures called the vascular system. This system is made of long, thin cells that are connected end-to-end, forming a continuous tube. The vascular system is the main support structure for the plant, and it is responsible for the transport of water and nutrients.
