

1. Identify the independent variable (IV) and the dependent variable (DV).
 2. Formulate a hypothesis (H) that predicts the relationship between the IV and DV.
 3. Design the study: Determine the sample, the measurement instruments, and the experimental design.
 4. Collect data: Gather the data according to the design.
 5. Analyze the data: Use statistical methods to test the hypothesis.
 6. Interpret the results: Draw conclusions based on the analysis.
 7. Report the findings: Write a research paper or report.
- Experimental Design and Hypothesis
- Experimental design is the plan or blueprint for a study. It specifies the IV, DV, and the relationship between them. The hypothesis is a statement that predicts the outcome of the study.
- Types of Experimental Design
1. Randomized Controlled Trial (RCT): The gold standard of experimental design. Participants are randomly assigned to two groups: an experimental group and a control group.
 2. Quasi-Experimental Design: Similar to RCT, but without random assignment.
 3. Naturalistic Observation: Observing behavior in a natural setting without intervention.
 4. Correlational Design: Examining the relationship between two variables without manipulating them.
 5. Case Study: In-depth investigation of a single individual or a small group.
 6. Survey Research: Collecting data from a large group of people through questionnaires or interviews.
 7. Focus Groups: Small group discussions to explore people's attitudes and beliefs.
- Statistical Analysis
- Statistical analysis is used to test the hypothesis and determine if the results are statistically significant. Common statistical tests include t-tests, ANOVA, regression analysis, and chi-square tests.
- Reporting Results
- Results should be reported in a clear and concise manner, including the IV, DV, and the statistical results. The conclusion should state whether the hypothesis was supported or not.
