- Keywords: life satisfaction, population, aging, well-being, happiness. Abstract: This study aims to explore the relationship between life satisfaction and aging in a population of older adults. The study was conducted using a cross-sectional design, with data collected from a sample of 100 participants aged 65 and older. The results indicate that life satisfaction is positively correlated with age, suggesting that older adults tend to report higher levels of life satisfaction compared to younger adults. This finding is consistent with the theory of the positivity effect, which posits that older adults are more likely to focus on positive experiences and emotions. The study also found that life satisfaction is influenced by various factors, including social support, health status, and financial stability. These findings have important implications for understanding the well-being of older adults and for developing interventions to enhance their quality of life.
