Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of convection within the mantle will also decrease. This could be the immediate reason there is no hot spot activity beneath the continents, where the crust is thicker and the heat loss is a lot more than the cooling to the ambient surface of the ocean. Another explanation involves the presence of a positive ΔT or temperature front below the surface of the mantle in proximity to continental crust. If so, the convection flow, the heat updrafts and the rate will be reduced, and convection would occur in the mantle further away from the continental crust. This would explain the presence of a number of the known hotspots beneath the oceans. The distance from the region of rising and sinking regions (hotspots) would increase.
