

Learning Objectives Define what birth, death, and life events are. Use graphs to predict the future course of a population. Explain the importance of population growth rates. Explain what the carrying capacity is. Explain what density and growth rates are.

Types of Population Dynamics		Change in Population	Graphs
Population Growth	Births > Deaths	A population is increasing when the birth rate is higher than the death rate, resulting in a net increase.
	Births = Deaths	A population is stable when the birth rate is equal to the death rate, resulting in no net change.
	Births < Deaths	A population is decreasing when the birth rate is lower than the death rate, resulting in a net decrease.
	Births > Deaths	A population is increasing when the birth rate is higher than the death rate, resulting in a net increase.

Lesson Summary

Describing Populations

Life History Strategies How do organisms study populations? Ecologists study the patterns of growth, death, and reproduction of a population. They use life history strategies to study the patterns of growth, death, and reproduction of a population.

Change in Population How does a population change? The change in population size is determined by the difference between the birth rate and the death rate. If the birth rate is higher than the death rate, the population will increase. If the birth rate is lower than the death rate, the population will decrease. If the birth rate is equal to the death rate, the population will remain stable.

Carrying Capacity The number of organisms that a population can support is called its carrying capacity. The carrying capacity of a population is determined by the amount of resources available to it. The carrying capacity of a population can change over time due to changes in the environment.
