Styge Beach, Australia, is an important nesting site for the critically endangered Laysan albatross (Diomedea immutabilis), with almost all breeding birds nesting at the beach. We used a combination of ground and aerial surveys to estimate the population of nesting albatrosses at Styge Beach. For each nest, 100 random points were generated by using a random number generator. At each point, a 10-m radius circle was drawn. If the nest was within the circle, the nest was counted. The proportion of circles containing a nest was multiplied by the total area of the beach to estimate the total number of nests. The proportion of circles containing a nest was multiplied by the total area of the beach to estimate the total number of nests. The proportion of circles containing a nest was multiplied by the total area of the beach to estimate the total number of nests.
