- Other studies using well known (well-validated) tests (e.g. Beck Depression Inventory) have shown that the prevalence of depression is higher in patients with chronic pain than in healthy controls. However, these studies have not taken into account the possibility that patients with chronic pain may have a higher prevalence of depression than healthy controls, but that this is due to the fact that they are more likely to be aware of their symptoms and seek help. This is a possibility that has not been fully explored in the literature.

- Interpretation: In reading a hypothesis, consider, apart from the independent variable, the dependent variable and the direction of the relationship. The hypothesis should be stated in a way that is testable. For example, "The number of people who use the Internet will increase over the next five years" is not testable because it is not clear what is being measured.

Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness of 10-year-old children. The program was designed to improve the children's physical fitness and to reduce the risk of obesity. The program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 30 minutes. The sessions included aerobic exercise, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The children's physical fitness was measured at the beginning and end of the program. The results showed that the children's physical fitness improved significantly after the 12-week program. The children's aerobic capacity, muscle strength, and flexibility all increased. The program was well-received by the children and their parents. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve the physical fitness of 10-year-old children.
