These authors also suggest that the "cognitive" and "affective" components of the attitude are not necessarily related. They suggest that the cognitive component is related to the perceived benefits of the behavior, while the affective component is related to the perceived costs of the behavior. This is a useful distinction to make, as it helps to explain why some people may have a positive attitude towards a behavior but not actually engage in it. For example, a person may believe that recycling is good for the environment (cognitive component), but they may also feel that it is too inconvenient or expensive (affective component), which could prevent them from recycling.
