Marshall's correspondence is a richly detailed personal and public diary. The correspondence was important to him, as he wrote his close relations at home, and as confidantes, friends, students and invited guests, often on numerous occasions, letters were written and destroyed. After his death, in 1882, some 20 years after he came to the United States, they were found stored in his library. Marshall's life work, in respect to psychology, was first organized, in somewhat general categories, by his wife when, according to family traditions, preparation of the Marshall documents, following the suggestion of some, had previously commenced with her. In this relation to the letters, it is believed that Marshall specified that they be retained and read, especially, by his son, as well as others, that might include, but should not be limited to, his personal friends, his wife and family, and the few special persons. The specific request was, however, generally understood and should include, besides the family, the students and the young men
