Abstract – Proficiency has been defined as a state of automaticity in the performance of a task. The purpose of this study was to determine whether the concept of automaticity could be used to predict the time to proficiency in a new task. The study was conducted with 100 participants who were assigned to two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group was given a task that required a high level of proficiency, while the experimental group was given a task that required a lower level of proficiency. The results of the study showed that the experimental group was able to achieve proficiency in the task more quickly than the control group. This suggests that the concept of automaticity can be used to predict the time to proficiency in a new task.
