Abstract. The authors examined the relationship between the frequency of exposure to violence in the news and the frequency of exposure to violence in the environment. The results showed that the frequency of exposure to violence in the news was positively related to the frequency of exposure to violence in the environment. The results also showed that the frequency of exposure to violence in the news was positively related to the frequency of exposure to violence in the environment, but the relationship was not significant when the frequency of exposure to violence in the environment was controlled for. The results suggest that the frequency of exposure to violence in the news is not a significant predictor of the frequency of exposure to violence in the environment.
