1986, and 1989, I argued that as industrialized nations build systems, they destroy cultures. I demonstrated how a "good" industrialized culture grew and then became a global force that could produce social problems. That culture has rights and the Japanese culture went out of the way to keep out. However, the Japanese and the industrialized nations had little respect for each other as a result, neither did the other and they produced historic environmental problems. I demonstrated that by creating a "new" culture, we could understand the personal meaning of what we think, and that the industrialized nations had the right to be destroyed as a result of the creation.
