

Production of Supernumerary PGCs during embryonic development

The diagram illustrates the production of supernumerary PGCs during embryonic development. The process begins with a zygote, which undergoes cleavage to form a morula. The morula then develops into a blastocyst, which implants in the uterine wall. The blastocyst consists of an inner cell mass (ICM) and an outer cell mass (ECM). The ICM gives rise to the embryo, while the ECM gives rise to the placenta. The diagram shows that the ICM can produce supernumerary PGCs, which are then transferred to the embryo.
