Ben Canada

Summary

Each fiscal year, Congress appropriates funds for grants to state and local governments to further national goals and assist state and local government operations. Examples of goals include attaining minimum national standards and improving program effectiveness. The federal government provides grants for numerous substantive purposes, such as crime prevention, community development, and transportation. In FY2001, grants to state and local governments totaled $317 billion.

Grants can be classified by the substantive purposes they address. This report, however, reviews the fundamental characteristics by which they can also be classified. Examples of grant characteristics include range of eligible activities, objectives, award process, and administrative requirements. This report will be updated as circumstances warrant.

Introduction to Grants-in-Aid

The term “grants-in-aid” typically refers to the assistance that the federal government provides to state and local governments. Federal assistance comes in many forms—monetary grants, loans, loan guarantees, insurance, and technical assistance, to mention a few examples. This report focuses on grants-in-aid to state and local governments. In FY2001, the federal government spent $317 billion in grants to states and localities—approximately 17% of total federal outlays.¹ Recipient governments use grants-in-aid to finance state and local programs in such areas as emergency services, transportation, and income maintenance for individuals.
