

PEDAGOGY IN HIGHER EDUCATION – AN ANALYSIS OF METHODOLOGICAL ASPECTS OF TWO SELECTED EDUCATIONAL RESEARCH PAPERS

ABSTRACT:

Reviewing and critically analyzing the works of others is a rewarding process in terms of one's own learning and development as highlighted by Wood & Kurzel (2008). Those who engage in such an analysis and reflective process gain more opportunities for developing their evaluative and critical abilities (Sluijsmans, Dochy, & Moerkerke, 1998). Identifying the good and bad approaches adopted by other others in their works help reviewers in their own works (Ballantyne, Hughes, & Mylonas, 2002), as through this process they acquire a deeper understanding of the writing standards (Hanrahan & Isaacs, 2001) and development of a life-long learning ability (Boase - Jelinek, Parker, & Herrington, 2014). Professor Simon Peyton Jones, a renowned researcher at Microsoft and Glasgow University, also identified the process of writing as a learning activity in itself that pushes the writers to be clearer, more focused and being more aware of what they do not understand.

With this aim, analysis and review of the methodology of two purposively selected journal articles related to pedagogy in higher education is undertaken in this paper. The scope of this review covers an examination of the research problem (identification, appropriateness, and explanation), literature review, theoretical underpinnings, methodology, research design and settings, methods and instruments, ethical considerations, data analysis, identification of potential limitations, conclusions, generalizations and reporting.

The lessons learnt through this research review study will be beneficial for reviewers and young researchers in improving the quality of their own research.

INTRODUCTION

For this analysis, the following two papers have been purposively selected based on their appropriateness for current research and relevant pragmatic considerations. The articles have been de-identified in accordance with the ethical requirements for current study (as the objective is to present critique of research techniques only):

1. Article 1 deals with integration of teaching and research in a first year food and nutrition course. It was published in a recognized educational research journal (included in the ERA list of journals, 2015) in the year 2012.
