

Evacuee/Resident Hurricane Recovery Information Booklet Instructions for the Library Compiler

Description: This document offers a template that a public library might use to assemble information,¹ in booklet form, that evacuees or residents might need when recovering from a hurricane disaster. The template consists of an alphabetical set of potential subject headings² some of which have relevant state or national web sites included. Subject headings might be added or deleted or altered for local use. Relevant local information sources may be added under each heading. For example, a potentially relevant subject heading, "BANKS" is suggested the local compiler would add contact information for each bank in the community. More than one means of contact is provided in case one means is out of order e.g., the phones don't work yet. Both template and accompanying example are in English but booklets in other languages may well be useful.

Format: You may wish to produce several booklets based on different areas of your city or county. The template is presented in a single column format using black and blue colors. You may wish to produce a three column, two-sided brochure or an (expensive) laminated two-sided information sheet³ for your town or county. You may want to include lots of graphics and colors or none at all. Critical is current, accurate, readable information. This means a format that is computer generated (i.e., a word processor) so that the information listed can be quickly changed at need. Note, make a copy before the lights go out and the storm begins. A web based version of this document on the public library's web site should also be considered. We call them dashboards. The benefit is that a web-based dashboard can be continuously updated.

Distribution: Ideally this is a document that is produced and distributed just prior to a storm event or when evacuees begin to arrive in town. The document can then be re-done as warranted by updated information and re-distributed. Either a new version is produced or an update sheet is produced. The document may be distributed to emergency responder organizations: public library, emergency management, police, fire, churches, Red Cross, etc. Next the document may be distributed where evacuees and residents are likely to gather: gas stations, supermarkets, malls, quick stops, hotels, etc. Where possible make arrangements with these distribution points and distributors in advance. One alternative is to distribute the document electronically across the community. Then have local production and distribution of the document at different pre-arranged locations. In that way, if one location is damaged, distribution may continue. You may want to keep a single source for production for accuracy and consistency.

Sources of Information: In general, all trusted sources should be considered. This may include government agencies, non-profits, businesses, churches, and schools. Include web sites even though they may not be accessible all the time. What works best is approaching each organization in advance of a storm⁴ and asking them to supply information to you whenever there is a change for inclusion. Be sure to offer the

² An arrangement by agency, like a directory or phone book requires a user to know which agency to contact. It does not help the evacuee who knows they need a shower. But does not know that the Y is making shower facilities available during the hurricane recovery period.
