Demirgüç-Kunt, 2003 We examine the impact of bank supervision on the financing obstacles faced by almost 5 000 corporations across 49 countries We find that firms in countries with strong official supervisory agencies that directly monitor banks tend to face greater financing obstacles Moreover powerful official supervision tends to increase firm reliance on special connections and corruption in raising external finance which is consistent with political regulatory capture theories Creating a supervisory agency that is independent of the government and banks mitigates the adverse consequences of powerful supervision Finally we find that bank supervisory agencies that force accurate information disclosure by banks and enhance private monitoring tend to ease the financing obstacles faced by firms
