Course Description: How do we see and hear? How does the brain make sense of all the sensory inputs it gets to produce the rich perceptual world you experience? This course will attempt to answer questions like these by providing an introduction to human sensory and perceptual systems. We will discuss the profound philosophical issues underlying the study of perception and the mind, the common methods by which sensations and perceptions can be measured (psychophysics), and the anatomy and physiology of the human visual and auditory system. Later in the semester, we will examine the manner in which various dimensions of visual stimuli are perceived, including color vision, depth and space perception, motion perception, visual form perception, and pattern recognition. We will learn how the anatomy and physiology of the eye and ear (and related parts of the brain) allow us to understand speech, perceive color, see motion and depth, and even recognize faces.

Our senses are the bridge between ourselves and the world. All of our knowledge and experience about the external world—from our favorite songs, to the feeling of sunlight on our skin, to the expressions on a loved one's face—is the results of sensory and perceptual processing. Some philosophers have gone as far as to claim that without sensory experience, people would not be conscious at all. The basic topic of this class is the psychological study of the relationship between the external world and our internal experience.

Course Goals:

The goals of this class are: (1) To provide a basic understanding of the senses. How do they work? What do they enable us to do? What are their limitations? (2) To understand the types of issues that scientists in this field find interesting, to understand why they are interesting, and to understand the basic research methods that are used to address them. (3) To understand the real-world applications of perception research. (4) To understand the roles of evolution, development, society, prior knowledge, and inference in our perceptual judgments and our conscious experiences.
