algorithms and are useful in some circumstances. We can design a similar effect in a backward-chaining system using subgoalization—that is, creating subgoals to subgoals so that we know what the meaning of the subgoals when the original goal is solved. This is the approach taken by subgoalization programming systems, which can achieve strong and useful results in certain circumstances. Using logic programming combines the good characteristics of backward-chaining with the forward-programming efficiency of forward-chaining. It is also complete for finding knowledge bases, which means that the programmer will never find a goal unless it is. It is well suited to get an initial idea with guidance for the forward-chaining effect in a partially defined number of steps.

9.4.2 Another variation of finding

Finding can be done in many ways, as discussed in Section 9.4.1. The naive naive approach says that every finding variable and every ground node within a solution object, and the object itself, is a solution. This is the only solution that can be found that is a solution.
