Electromechanical brake serve

Overview

With its electric drive, the central requirements for achieving the braking function both without recuperation and at different levels of recuperation also apply to the Axle Drive (2). Based on previous experience, the driver expects a braking effect which corresponds to the pressure placed on the brake pedal. Depending on the recuperation taking place and the braking power being power assisted by the electric drive motor(s), the "remaining" braking effect must be provided by the hydraulic brake system. This is not possible with a conventional pneumatic brake serve with a fixed ratio of pedal force to piston rod force of the brake master cylinder. These complex requirements can only be met by an electromechanical brake serve.

The electromechanical brake serve is able to induce brake pressure independently of the driver. When recuperation is taking place, the hydraulic brake pressure can be restricted to the level required. Alternatively, brake pressure can be generated actively without being initiated by the driver if other systems request it (e.g. adaptive cruise assist/ACC).

Design and function

This complex module consists of brake serve control unit (BSP), a two-stage gear drive, an electric motor to drive the gearing, a distance sensor and the coupling/rod which connects to the brake pedal.

000_000

000_000

Excepting the gearing technology used, the design and functions of the second generation electromechanical brake serve correspond to those of the systems already in use on other Axle Drives.

Reference

Further information on how an electromechanical brake serve works can be found in Service Training programme 04.1.1.14 "AX Sparten in a nutshell - Electromechanical Brake Serve".

The brake serve on the Axle Drive (2) works on the basis of a two-stage gear drive driven by an electric motor. The output of the gear drive is a spindle shaft. When the brake serve is active, the rotational movement of the spindle shaft is converted into a large lateral movement of the spindle rod on the shaft. The spindle rod is in contact with a thrust piece which moves longitudinally and presses the force on its reaction plate. The force initiated by the driver on the brake pedal is also applied to this reaction plate by the piston rod. The reaction plate operates the piston rod of the brake master cylinder, thereby generating brake pressure. The two forces work independently of each other. The activation of the electric motor allows brake pressure to be generated even if the driver does not press the brake pedal. A sensor designed on the principle of inductively brake pedal position sensor C000, brake pedal position sensor C000, detects the pedal travel initiated by the driver. In doing this, the control unit calculates the braking torque desired by the driver and the amount of braking assistance required.

If other systems (e.g. deceleration request by the adaptive cruise assist) require that brake pressure be generated automatically, control unit (CU) receives the message requesting implementation from ABS control unit (CU).

Active recuperation (VTR) used on the Axle Drive (2) and AX (2) is not fitted on the Axle Drive (2). The recuperator's function is assumed by the ECU.
