

EDDYSTONE

AMATEUR BAND

COMMUNICATIONS RECEIVER

Model "888"

Instruction Manual

The Eddystone "888" receiver has been designed essentially for use in the amateur bands and has six ranges, each covering a major amateur band.

The expanded scales, each practically twelve inches long, gives that large degree of band spread so much sought after, and another advantage is that the tuned circuits have constants which lead to optimum performance on each individual range. All but two of the twelve valves are of the miniature type.

The receiver is of the double superheterodyne type, with a high first intermediate frequency, for good image protection, and a low second intermediate frequency, for high gain and selectivity. The latter is continuously variable, and this feature, in conjunction with the separate RF, IF and AF gain controls, enables maximum intelligibility to be obtained from both telegraphy and telephony signals, under the varying conditions of operation met within the amateur bands.

The six switched ranges are based on international agreements and are as follows:—

28,000 kc/s. to 30,000 kc/s.

21,000 kc/s. to 21,500 kc/s.

14,000 kc/s. to 14,350 kc/s.

7,000 kc/s. to 7,300 kc/s.

3,500 kc/s. to 4,000 kc/s.

1,800 kc/s. to 2,000 kc/s.
