Students will often produce a sentence describing an event and then conclude with the last day of the month. For instance, "I started school in September and finished in December and today is December 12th." Such a sentence is not grammatically correct. The following sentence, "I started school in September and finished in December, and today is December 12th," is grammatically correct. The comma after December separates the phrase "I started school in September and finished in December" from the phrase "today is December 12th." The comma is needed to separate the two phrases.
