

RINGO

RINGO STARR rarely goes shopping nowadays. It's not that he's frightened of being mobbed, or held up for hours by shop assistants wanting autographs, or even that, like most men, he just hates shopping—it's simply that he does not like being taken for a ride.

"It took me some time to realize I was gettin' done in shops over things that weren't marked with a price. For a while after, I didn't really mind—I was flush, so why should I worry? But there's only so many times you let yourself be taken for a mug. Now I send someone else in first to ask the price, then go in myself, and if I find, as I usually do, they ask me more, I send me mate back in to get it. Maureen does all the family shopping for the same reason—hardly anybody recognizes her."

That's just part of the price Ringo Starr has to pay for having a name and a face known to millions of people all over the world. Although it upsets him, he accepts it along with a lavish home, his M.B.E. and enough money to make a sizeable hole in the National Debt, as part and parcel of success.

The phenomenal rise to fame the Beatles have had in just five years is already legendary, and literally millions of words in dozens of languages have told the story of the four lads from Liverpool over and over again.

"One of the favourite questions is 'Has success changed you?' In the early days I went through a phase of saying 'No, I'm still the same simple lad I always was', but that's a load of rubbish. Of course I've changed—I'm changing every day—but how much of it is due to success, I don't know. It's like when people ask what I'd have been like if I hadn't made it—I can't tell, because I have."

He carries his success well—he doesn't flaunt it, nor does he try and belittle it. It's something almost apart from the four lads who come together to play the music they like.

"When we're just muckin' around,
