

Mechanical Working in Plastic Polymers

Background:

Amorphous polymers are known to have random molecular packing through which they can easily break down the stress of a local rupture. Consequently, amorphous polymers have a high degree of ductility. However, crystalline polymers, which have order in the molecular configuration, have a more regular packing of molecules. This regular packing makes it difficult for the polymer chains to move past each other, leading to a more rigid and brittle material. The degree of crystallinity (the amount of the polymer that is crystalline) affects the mechanical properties of the polymer. For example, a polymer with a high degree of crystallinity will be stronger and stiffer than a polymer with a low degree of crystallinity. The degree of crystallinity can be controlled by the processing conditions, such as cooling rate and annealing time. The degree of crystallinity also affects the optical properties of the polymer, with crystalline regions acting as light scatterers.

Objectives:

1. Understand the concept of mechanical working in plastic polymers.
2. Study the effect of mechanical working on the mechanical properties of plastic polymers.

Materials:

- 1. Plastic polymer
- 2. Machine
- 3. Tool

Procedure:

1. Preparation of a sample of plastic polymer for mechanical working. The sample should be prepared in a way that allows for the application of a controlled amount of stress. This can be done by using a machine to apply a known force to the sample.
2. The sample should be prepared in a way that allows for the measurement of the mechanical properties. This can be done by using a machine to measure the force required to deform the sample.
3. The sample should be prepared in a way that allows for the measurement of the mechanical properties. This can be done by using a machine to measure the force required to deform the sample.
4. The sample should be prepared in a way that allows for the measurement of the mechanical properties. This can be done by using a machine to measure the force required to deform the sample.

Observe the effect of mechanical working on the mechanical properties of plastic polymers.
