Phosphorus stress encourages an accumulation of soluble phosphorus in the leaves, which can be detected by a yellowing of the leaves. This yellowing is caused by the accumulation of phosphorus in the leaves, which is a result of the plant's inability to move phosphorus from the leaves to the roots. This yellowing is a common symptom of phosphorus deficiency in many plants, including corn. The yellowing is most pronounced in the older leaves, which are the first to show signs of stress. The younger leaves, which are still developing, may also show some yellowing, but it is usually less pronounced.
