algorithms and are subject to local minimization. We can think of genetic algorithms as a heuristic learning system using evolutionary ideas to learning systems to optimize a fitness or fitness-like function. These systems often do not find better solutions than applying the genetic algorithm. This is the approach taken by evolutionary programming systems, which use efficient storage and retrieval mechanisms to optimize performance. Genetic programming combines the good ideas of both evolutionary learning with the domain programming efficiency of heuristic learning. It is also complete for learning knowledge bases, which means that the programmer need never know what kinds of things he or she will use to get an entity thing with predicate like `isinstance(x, Y)`. The latter is a generally understood notion of closure.

Working with children's computers is discussed in Section 5.1.4. The chapter on computer programming says that even though computers and many general-purpose editors are available off-the-shelf, and the Internet world is becoming more and more open, computers that are designed to be used by children are needed.
