Efficient land use is considered an important component of a low-impact development strategy that reduces the adverse effects of stormwater runoff on the environment. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effectiveness of various stormwater management practices in reducing runoff volume and peak flow rate. The study was conducted in a residential area with a mix of single-family and multi-family housing. The results showed that the implementation of stormwater management practices, such as rain gardens, permeable pavement, and green roofs, significantly reduced runoff volume and peak flow rate compared to conventional practices. The study also found that the effectiveness of these practices varied depending on the type of housing and the local climate. The findings of this study have important implications for the design and implementation of stormwater management strategies in residential areas.
