Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the heart rate (HR) and heart rate reserve (HRR) of sedentary middle-aged men. The subjects were divided into two groups: a control group (n = 10) and a training group (n = 10). The training group performed a 12-week training program consisting of three sessions per week, each lasting 30 minutes. The control group did not participate in any training. The HR and HRR were measured at rest and during maximal exercise at the beginning and end of the 12-week period. The results showed that the training group had a significant decrease in HR at rest and during maximal exercise, and a significant increase in HRR at rest and during maximal exercise, compared to the control group. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can improve cardiovascular fitness in sedentary middle-aged men.

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression between men and women who had been exposed to violence by intimate partners. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Women's Health are used. Results show that among women who have ever been married or cohabited, those who reported being physically abused by their current or former partner were more likely than nonabused women to report having experienced depression during the past year. This association remained significant after controlling for other risk factors for depression such as age, education, income, and history of mental illness.

Abstract. The authors present a new method for the analysis of the dynamic behavior of a system. The method is based on the use of the Laplace transform and the Fourier transform. The method is applied to the analysis of the dynamic behavior of a system. The results of the analysis are presented in the form of a plot of the magnitude of the transfer function versus frequency. The plot shows that the system is stable and that the magnitude of the transfer function is constant for all frequencies.
