CHAPTER 1 Applying Scientific Methods

When scientists conduct their perhaps most basic research, they investigate and discover whether their concepts (hypotheses) that they develop about how and why things happen in the biological world are correct. They use scientific methods and logical and statistical approaches about which they already know to achieve their objectives. (The basic scientific method is described in a separate chapter.) They begin with forming a hypothesis (hypotheses are statements or concepts that are considered to be true before they are proven). They then look for the facts in the laboratory and field that they can use about how and why things happen. A hypothesis is a statement. The greatest scientific achievement has to be the discovery of how and why things happen. The scientific method is a process. Scientists have formulated procedures of problem solving that are accepted and used by scientists around the world. This includes defining questions, forming a hypothesis, designing an experiment, gathering data, analyzing the results, concluding, and repeating the results.

Part II: Studying Scientific Methods Used in Biology

Scientists investigate plants that respond. What scientific method did they use to prove this?

Dr. John Smith set up an experiment to determine whether plants respond to light. He used 10 plants that were grown in the same greenhouse and had the same soil and amount of water. Group A was given 12 hours of light each day, and Group B was given 6 hours of light each day. The plants in Group A were taller than the plants in Group B. The results are shown in Figure 1.

Analysis and Conclusion

Group A plants grew taller than Group B plants.

1. Explain which plants represent the control group? The experimental group?

The control group is Group B. The experimental group is Group A. The control group is the group that is not being tested. The experimental group is the group that is being tested.
